
In Memory of Coby M. Cutler

April 17, 1977 - August 23, 1995

Shortly after noon yesterday, six Marines came through open doors of an old white church in Scituate carrying the un-natural weight of a dead 18-year-old's flag draped coffin. Beneath a spectacular sky on a warm and beautiful day, they gently placed their heavy burden in the back of their silver hearse parked at the steps a few feet off a country road in a town where nearly everyone expects only the best to occur.

The young man now dead was Coby Cutler. He was killed last week in Parris Island, SC.. Struck by lighting while out on the rifle range at the Marine Corps Recruit Depot. An inexplicable act of God.

A few weeks ago, Cutler graduated from Scituate High, located about one mile from the church where his funeral service was held yesterday. On that brilliant June evening, he sat with his class on folding chairs placed on the football field between a stage containing school officials and a grandstand crowded with proud parents and fine looking families.

Coby Cutler was one of a handful of graduates in the class of 1995 to choose an option other than college. When his name was called, he bounded up the stairs of the stage to shake hands and accept his diploma. He was handsome, polite and eager to go.

Now, in a stunning definition of mortality, he was back in Scituate, his grieving parents leaning on one another as they slowly emerged from the church behind the Marines who stutter-stepped their boy toward a funeral hearse.

The service was attended by many of his classmates and more of his friends. A number of them arrived, stunned to silence by the fact of death, wearing a universal uniform of youth - tieless, khakis, sneakers - in order to say good-bye to a boy being buried in an outfit of his country.

Through the tears and a nearly unbearable sadness yesterday, the obvious once again was on parade: Summer is a true season of the young and hardly anyone Coby Cutler's age ever thinks they will encounter an end.

This young man, Coby Cutler, had a few items too many 18-year-olds are without: He had friends, family, an education, respect, self-pride and a future he helped define.

Unlike so many other deaths of young people that shatter our sensibilities because they occurred due to the natural causes of the age - a handgun, drugs, a smirk, a glance, a debate over territory, turf, sneakers or a girl - this one cannot be explained by sermon. And there is no inner strength great enough to create a reason. Faith will have to do.

So the long procession slowly wound along a narrow road to a small cemetery in West Scituate where rifles volleyed in hollow tribute and a single sailor dressed in white stood in the shade of a splendid elm to play a mournful taps. Many of those at the graveside belonged to the class of '95 and they were there yesterday to put their friend in the ground as well as utter a wistful farewell to their own lost youth.
